

Royal Opening at The Florrie

22/01/2013

HRH The Prince of Wales has previously visited the Florrie when it was in its dilapidated state. The building, when derelict, had lapsed ownership to the Duchy of Lancaster and was kindly gifted back to the community under care of the Florence Institute Trust. The Trust was eager for HRH to witness the spectacular revival of the Florrie.

The Florrie is an inspirational story of a community that refused to see their rich heritage disappear. A building of architectural and social merit, the Florrie was built in 1889 by Bernard Hall in memory of his daughter Florence who tragically died at the age of 22. As a former Major of Liverpool, he was aware of the hardships faced by the local boys. His intention was to provide a place of recreation and instruction to the poor and working lads of the area.

The Florrie has benefited not only from the financial support of her funders but also the invaluable practical and professional support given. They are the Heritage Lottery Fund (HLF)'s £4.2million grant funding, European Regional Development Fund's £1.58 million grant funding, NWDA's £536K grant funding, the Architectural Heritage Fund's £257K finance provider, Liverpool City Council's £150K grant funding, the Tudor Trust's £150K grant funding and Garfield Weston Foundation's £50K grant funding.

Tiffany Hunt, new Chair of Heritage Lottery Fund's North West Committee, said: "The Heritage Lottery Fund is extremely proud to have supported this wonderful restoration project which brings together heritage, sport and local people under one roof. Today's royal opening is a great opportunity for the team behind the Florrie to showcase their achievements and celebrate putting a much-loved building right back into the heart of the community."

The rebirth of the Florrie is testament to the work and commitment of the trust, its members, friends and the community whose continued support is essential to Florrie's future success. The Florrie is now a vibrant community centre with a multitude of events, activities and projects all taking place in this living museum and drawing on the buildings heritage for its vision.
